

MOMENTUM

Problem & Solution

One thing done. Every day.

A short, plain-English report on the problem Momentum solves, the solution we built, and why it is different from the tools you have already tried.

1 Introduction

This document explains a real problem and the solution we are building for it. It is written in plain English, with no jargon. If you are busy, just read the bold sentences — they carry the whole story.

The short version: lots of busy people plan and plan, but never finish. We are building Momentum, a simple app that gives you one task to do each day — so you actually finish things.

2 The Problem

Who this is for

Someone in their 20s or 30s who works full time and is studying or learning on the side — a certification, a course, or a skill that could earn them more. They have calendars, notebooks, and to-do lists. They still feel stuck.

The feeling: “busy but stuck”

They always have a plan, but they don't do it. They postpone the one task that matters most — and then they feel guilty about it. Over time, that guilt turns into stress and burnout, which makes putting things off even worse.

PROCRASTINATE → FEEL GUILTY → STRESS → BURNOUT → PROCRASTINATE MORE

Why existing tools don't help

To-do lists hand you everything at once — twenty items, no clear starting point. Overwhelmed, you pick nothing. Calendars only help you plan time; they don't commit you to the single task that actually moves you forward. The result: you are busy every day but never moving forward.

3 The Solution

Momentum closes the gap between planning and doing. Each day it narrows you down to a single Most Important Task (MIT) — the one thing that matters most today. Not a list of twenty items. Just one thing.

You check that one thing off when it's done. That gives you a real feeling of a finished task — progress instead of guilt. And because there is only ever one thing to do, it is small enough that you actually do it.

In one line: To-do lists help you plan. Momentum helps you finish.

4 How It Works

Three short steps, repeated every day:

- 1 Set it.
Each evening, name the one task that matters most tomorrow. One task — not a list.
- 2 Do it.
Focus on just that one thing. Nothing else to distract you.
- 3 Check it.
One tap tells the whole day “done.” Repeat tomorrow.

5 Why It's Different

Today's tools	Momentum
Hand you everything at once	Hands you one thing
Twenty items, no starting point	One clear Most Important Task
Leave you with guilt about what's unfinished	Give you a real finished feeling
Help you plan	Help you finish

Momentum isn't a better to-do list. Excessive lists are part of the problem — Momentum removes the list and keeps the one task that matters.

6 What Exists Today

The landing page is built and working. It starts with the problem, leads with the solution, explains how it works, and collects waitlist emails in one click.

Why a waitlist? Momentum is in private beta. Joining the waitlist gets you early access and a launch-day email. One signup, one click, no friction.

7 What's Next

The plan from here is simple:

- 1 Test with real people.
Watch someone use the page for one minute and fix the three most confusing things.
- 2 Deploy publicly.
Put the site on the open web so anyone with the link can see it and join the waitlist.
- 3 Connect a real signup form.
Save the emails behind the landing page so the waitlist actually grows.

8 In One Sentence

Momentum — One thing done. Every day.

Busy people don't fail from a lack of planning — they fail from too many options. Momentum sets that aside and hands you the one task that matters, so you can finally finish something.
